San José State University's Institute for the Study of Sport, Society and Social change

- In January 2017, SJSU launched the Institute for the Study of Sport, Society and Social Change.
- San Jose State occupies a unique niche in the history of sport and social change—because of its people. The university is the birthplace of the Olympic Project for Human Rights (OPHR), a movement led by Harry Edwards that culminated in the iconic protest of Olympic medalists Tommie Smith and John Carlos.
- The legacy of equity and social justice is a part of SJSU's DNA. The university was founded on education for all and providing a voice for those who may otherwise remain silent. The ISSSSC honors this legacy and continues the dialogue about athlete activism and the influence of sport in effecting positive social change.
- As our nation confronts and explores deeply complex social issues, it is critical that we continue to challenge the boundaries of sport and activism. Sport offers the occasion to pose big questions, not just of athletes, but also of ourselves and provide enlightened perspectives.

The Institute for the Study of Sport, Society and Social Change is dedicated to research, analysis and education at the intersection of sport and society.
